Climate is the most important factor in soil formation. It has two components, temperature and rainfall. Vegetation, micro-organisms and animals, including many greatly influence the formation of soil. Vegetation exerts its main influence on soil formation through the amount and nature of the organic matter that it adds to the soil. Relief influences soil formation primarily as a factor affecting erosion and as a modifier of climate and water-air relationship.

Parent material is the initial state of the soil system as it represents the weathered rock materials from which the soil develops. The kind of soil that develops depends in part upon the kind of parent rocks and parent materials which influence the physical and chemical properties of the resulting soil. The maturity of a soil is determined by the time factor. The length of time required for a soil to develop horizons depends upon many inter-related factors such as climate, nature of the parent material, organism and relief.
