Art is beauty. Through it, people create beautiful objects to express their ideas and feelings. Art appears in different forms, such as embroidery, carvings, pottery, painting, weaving, smelting, music and literature. African counties are praised for their artistic activities. These activities have been acquired and transmitted from one generation to another.

Tanzania is very rich in art and craft. Many tribes have preserved their culture and traditions. The Maasai, for example, can still be seen in their traditional clothes of red and blue, or purple painted sheets, beautifully plaited hair for men, beads and necklaces for women. The Makonde are world-famous for their splendid carvings from ebony wood. In some tribes, iron and gold smelting is still done traditionally. However, this technology is gradually dying out due to industrial production of iron tools and gold ornaments.

In most African societies, women engage in pottery, weaving, dyeing of clothing materials. They produce such articles as pots, baskets, mats and carpets. Besides, they produce fancy embroidered and dyed dress materials.

In recent years, people have witnessed the decline of African art and craft. Too major reasons have contributed to this unfortunate situations. The first reason is commercialisation of art work. Today's African artists are less interested in the perfection of their stills and the beauty of their products. They simply produce for money. As a result, the quality of art work has been diminishing. The second factor is the penetration of foreign culture into African societies. Africans have either fully copied or imitated foreign cultures in an attempt to appear modern. Ladies now carry imported plastic or leather bags instead of locally woven baskets. Plastic and metal bowls and pots have replaced traditionally made wooden ones. We cannot deny the rapid cultural changes in the world but we still need to promote our culture and traditions despite the changes in people's taste in art.
